

Democrat Strategist James Carville Raises Serious Doubts About Biden's True Capabilities

March 6, 2024

On Wednesday morning on Morning Joe, veteran Democratic strategist James Carville expressed serious doubts about President Joe Biden's "capabilities" and called Biden's rejection of an interview before to last month's Super Bowl "telling."

A recent ABC News/Ipsos survey found that 86% of voting-age adults think that 81-year-old Joe Biden is too old to be commander in chief.

"How do you address the age issue? And I'm just curious, do you agree with people close to Biden, people who've been friends with Biden for a long time, that maybe he's been protected a little too much? Let the guy get out there!" Scarborough asked Carville.

"Well, I mean, their decisions, how much he gets out there, have to be made by him and has to be made by people that interact with him every day and understand what the benefits and the risks are. But it's hard for me to sit here a thousand miles away and say, 'Well, you should do this with him' when they are much more attuned to what he's capable of doing or not capable of doing." Carville said in response.

“I thought it was telling when he didn’t do the Super Bowl interview. But, you know, to their credit, they came back and they put him on Seth Meyers, which I think helped a little bit. But I don’t, this is a big obstacle that they’re faced with and they have to deal with it.” Carville added.

“But the good news for the Biden campaign is Trump is very weak. You saw the exposure he has in the Republican primaries, you’re going to see more exposure with this March 25 trial coming up in New York, a much underplayed event. And he’s not the most coherent person that ever lived either.” he concluded.

The survey was conducted just after Special Counsel Robert Hur disclosed that Biden had asked him if he was “still” vice president in 2009, his first year in that role.
